We are a community of people who love the outdoors and champion wild places.

MISSION
We work with communities to protect Montana’s wilderness heritage, quiet beauty, and outdoor traditions now and for future generations.

VALUES
We value innovation, integrity, collaboration, stewardship, and tenacity.

VISION
We envision a future where, from the rugged mountains to the vast prairies, Montana’s wild places are protected, connected, and restored because Montanans value wilderness as essential to our heritage and way of life.
Craddled between Glacier National Park and the Bob Marshall Wilderness, the Badger-Two Medicine is a prime example of what makes Montana so special.

Meadows sprawl up the sides of hovering mountains, gin-clear streams brush the bottoms of craggy limestone cliffs, and dense stands of fir and aspens swoop down onto the prairie below. The Badger is vital habitat for grizzly bears, Canada lynx, wolverines, west-slope cutthroat trout, and all the other species that make the Crown of the Continent ecosystem so extravagantly wild.

But whereas the Blackfeet people see a sacred homeland and others see a place of wild beauty, some have pictured oil wells and private profit. With this picture in mind, the Department of Interior under Secretary James Watt issued dozens of oil and gas leases in the Badger in the 1980s.

It took 35 years, but together we finally got rid of the last 18 remaining leases this year. Thanks to your passion and commitment, the Badger-Two Medicine remains wild.

MWA has played a pivotal role in the saga of the Badger-Two Medicine since the leases were issued 35 years ago. The saga, told in a documentary MWA produced in 2016 called Our Last Refuge, has taken many harrowing turns over the years. The story will no doubt continue over the next four years, as we now face a presidential administration and Congress that could try to roll back decades of conservation gains. This makes our work to protect Montana’s wild places and public lands more essential than ever.

We indeed expect a fight over the next four years. Thanks to you, we’re ready for it. We now have more than 5,000 members, some 20,000 friends, seven chapters, and a team of 25 remarkable staff members located in seven offices across Montana. We’re built to galvanize, mobilize, and win.

In spite of the results of the 2016 election, we remain hopeful and resolute. That’s because our values—clean water, abundant wildlife, healthy forests, and access to public lands—are Montana’s values, and those values transcend the current, bitter state of American politics. The 35-year fight to save the Badger-Two Medicine is proof of that.

Another reason for our optimism is the high profile public lands now have in Montana’s political arena. With MWA’s support, Governor Steve Bullock unveiled a powerful pro-public lands agenda in 2016 that includes fighting all attempts to seize federal public lands, protecting access to all of our public lands, and creating an office of outdoor recreation. MWA will have a strong presence at the 2017 Legislative Session rallying support for this agenda and fighting back against any legislation aimed at selling off our public lands.

One more reason for our optimism is the Blackfoot Clearwater Stewardship Project (BCSP), a Montana-made solution for solving public lands challenges in the Seeley Lake and Ovando area. The BCSP proposal would add 80,000 acres to the Bob Marshall, Scapegoat, and Mission Mountains Wilderness Areas. MWA worked tirelessly this past year building public support for the BCSP. Seventy-four percent of Montanans now support the proposal, as do dozens of organizations, business, and political leaders, including Montana Senator Jon Tester. He reaffirmed that support days after the election, fueling our confidence that the BCSP proposal could very well be introduced in Congress this year.

We no doubt face some daunting challenges in the years to come. But in our 58 years, MWA has persevered under similarly difficult political conditions and even won significant conservation victories in challenging times. Because of your commitment, we’re confident we’ll continue to find success.

– Brian Sybert, executive director
– Lee Bomman, state council president (2015–2016)
I started working for MWA in June of 2013. Having lived in Choteau for a few years, I had already spent lots of time exploring the Rocky Mountain Front—floating the Sun River, cross-country skiing up the West Fork of the Teton, hiking and backpacking in the Dearborn and Deep Creek.

But I had never been to the Badger-Two Medicine.

Like so many others before me, I turned to MWA’s Wilderness Walks program to experience a new, wild place for the first time. It was one of those glorious, early summer days with crystal-clear blue skies and blooming flowers blanketing every meadow, a day that makes all the cares in the world loosen their grip.

We saw a sow grizzly and her two grown cubs graze their way across an open hillside, unaware of our presence. A small herd of elk roamed across another hillside. The leaders of the hike, who were local members of the Glacier-Two Medicine Alliance, told the group about the 30-year struggle to make sure this place is never developed for oil and gas. We enjoyed our lunch and shook our heads at the preposterous idea that anyone would want to destroy such a special place.

Ten days later, an oilman from Louisiana, Sidney Longwell, filed a lawsuit, demanding his right to drill on his lease in the Badger-Two Medicine.

Today, that lease and all others that remained at the beginning of 2016 have been cancelled, lifting the 35-year specter of industrial development in the Badger-Two Medicine.

On a trip to Washington, D.C. shortly after this year’s election, I walked down the hall toward the office of the Secretary of the Interior in the esteemed company of Blackfeet leaders, conservation partners, and a small horde of press. I paused for just a moment in front of the portrait of James Watt. As secretary of Interior under President Reagan, he launched the wholesale leasing campaign to sell off the rights to oil and gas, at $1 acre, in a host of wild places, including the Badger.

It was a surreal moment to ponder how far we had come. Countless phone calls, thousands of public pleas, hundreds of meetings and petitions, and numerous over-flights and educational events and ceremonies all leading to this day.

In Secretary Jewell’s office, I witnessed both the U.S. government and Devon Energy, an oil company that held 15 Badger leases, recognize the importance of correcting a mistake made long ago, of being good neighbors, and of doing the right thing.

The following evening, we screened the 25-minute documentary film Our Last Refuge to a captivated crowd at the National Museum of the American Indian.

“The fact that MWA has persevered for more than 30 years on a campaign that seemed impossible at times and now has seen tremendous success demonstrates its tenacity.”

– Rhonda Ronan

The Badger-Two Medicine is vital habitat for grizzlies and elk

Right: Fall comes to the Badger-Two Medicine
Produced by MWA, the film chronicles the 35-year struggle to save the Badger from development. At the closing of the film, rather than implore our guests to contact Secretary Jewell and ask for the remaining leases to be cancelled—as we had done in October at nearly a dozen screenings of the documentary across Montana—we instead thanked her, her staff, and all of those present for listening to Montanans, for listening to the Blackfeet, for doing the right thing.

At that moment, I couldn’t help but think back to the first time I had visited the Badger-Two Medicine. Though I was wearing heels instead of hiking boots that night in D.C., I had the same feeling of lightness and optimism I’d experienced watching grizzly bears graze and elk roam, a feeling that told me whatever challenges we might face in the next four years, wild places will endure as long as we keep up the fight.

In the coming year, we will work diligently to ensure that the tremendous progress we have made is not undone and that the trajectory of this irreplaceable area and the partnerships that have defended it for so long continues on a path to permanent protection.

– Casey Perkins, Rocky Mountain Front field director
“I give to MWA because no organization in Montana is working harder to ensure that public lands remain in public hands.”

– Emma Elson
As a child growing up outside Helena and surrounded by national forest, public lands were my playground. After school and on weekends, my friends and I would spend hours prowling around the rocks, building forts, pretending to be mountain lions on the hunt. At the time, I took public lands for granted, but after years of living all around the country, I realize how lucky I was to grow up in Montana and how deeply our public lands shape people in our state.

Now, as the new state policy director at MWA, I get to work to protect those places, to ensure that generations of kids have the same opportunity to play in the forest. Unfortunately, over the last few years, we’ve seen efforts across the West to transfer these lands to state as a first step towards industrializing and privatizing them.

MWA has been at the forefront in the fight against lands transfer, working with decision makers to strengthen support for public lands and activating our large and passionate base of supporters to speak up for our national lands. We’ve had a lot of defense to play—from bills at the federal level which seek to transfer deed or management of millions of acres of national forests to county-level proposals that continue to pop up in our own backyard. So far, our efforts have been successful. Not only have we defeated all transfer attempts thus far, but we’ve also shown our elected officials that keeping public lands in public hands is non-negotiable, and their rhetoric has mostly reflected that fact. We will be watching closely to ensure their actions match their words. If not, we will hold them accountable.

One bright spot amidst these attacks on our public lands has been the willingness of our members, supporters, and coalition partners to stand up again and again for public lands. This grassroots support has been so vocal and so vigorous that we’ve been able to create new opportunities to pass proactive policies at the state level agenda that includes rejecting lands transfer at every turn, creating of an Office of Outdoor Recreation, creating a new public lands access advocate position, and restoring Habitat Montana, a popular state program that funnels proceeds from out-of-state hunting licenses to conserving sensitive wildlife habitat.

To raise awareness of the public land agenda, MWA created a short film thanking the governor for his proposals. Shared on our blog and via social media, the film was viewed more than 62,000 times. Throughout the summer, we continued to keep the spotlight on these proposals, launching a public lands radio ad campaign and taking out full-page ads in all major newspapers across the state. We backed up these media projects with large-scale grassroots organizing through a vote pledge campaign in which more than 5,000 Montanans, mostly college-aged, pledged to vote to keep public lands in public hands.

As a result of these and other engagement activities, in just the past year MWA has nearly doubled our number of identified public lands supporters. Now, through targeted communications, events, and calls to action, we are working to activate these supporters as grassroots advocates in the state legislature this coming year. With thousands of public lands supporters signing petitions, making phone calls, sending emails, writing letters, and having face-to-face meetings, we will together advance Governor Bullock’s pro-public lands agenda and stop proponents of lands transfer from jeopardizing our outdoor way of life.

– Kayje Booker, state policy director
On a cold, snowy morning in January 2016, I hopped in my car before dawn and headed east from my home in Missoula, winding through Hellgate Canyon before hanging a left up the Big Blackfoot River. Passing the spectacular cliffs of Russell Gates, I emerged in the kettle pond-studded valley around Ovando and gazed up at the sweep of the southwest Crown of the Continent, the unprotected doorstep of the Bob Marshall and Scapegoat Wilderness areas and the headwaters of the Blackfoot. In my rearview mirror, the sun’s first rays painted the distant cornices and peaks of the Mission Mountains a deep magenta.

It’s been forty years since Norman Maclean’s A River Runs Through It first inspired countless Americans to pick up a fly rod and make the pilgrimage to Montana’s Big Blackfoot River. The novella has probably done more than any work of art to raise the profile of Montana in the national consciousness. It also beautifully evokes the spiritual value of engaging with the wild.

On this morning, I was making a leap of faith, so to speak. The Montana Association of Christians’ board of directors was meeting at a retreat center in Lincoln. I was both excited and nervous to ask for their support of the Blackfoot Clearwater Stewardship Project, a collaborative proposal that would permanently protect 80,000 acres of wilderness around Seeley Lake and Ovando—including a good portion of the lands I saw out my window as I crossed the North Fork of the Blackfoot and continued east past Kleinschmidt Flat. The proposal would expand the Bob Marshall, the Scapegoat, and the Mission Mountains Wilderness Areas to include the North Fork of the Blackfoot, Monture Creek, the wild Swan Range front, Grizzly Basin, and the West Fork of the Clearwater.

As Norman Maclean’s words about religion and fly fishing echoed in my head, and as I thought about the transformative power of wild places and wild rivers in my own life, the anxiety I felt about the meeting vanished into the crisp morning light. These were people who shared my belief that humanity needs wild places to remind us of our relationship—and our responsibility—to the rest of creation.

Often I find myself speaking to chambers of commerce or county commissions, defending wilderness using the latest science and economic statistics. How refreshing it was to speak to an audience that deeply appreciated the intangible and intrinsic qualities of wild places.

I left the meeting confident that the board would endorse the Blackfoot Clearwater Stewardship Project, and it later did, in a beautiful letter to the congressional delegation and in an inspirational op-ed published in several Montana newspapers.

With the help of critical endorsements by the Montana Associations of Christians and dozens of other organizations, businesses, individuals, and governmental entities, we feel confident that the Blackfoot Clearwater Stewardship Project proposal will take a big leap forward in the coming year, quite possibly as a piece of congressional legislation.

In the meantime, I’ll be working on strengthening MWA’s partnerships with communities of faith on behalf of the wild places that sustain and connect us.

– Zack Porter, western Montana field director

“Seventy-four percent of Montanans support protecting important wildlands around Seeley Lake and Ovando. That kind of overwhelming support is a testament to the hard work MWA puts into building consensus on behalf of Montana’s wildest places.”

– Will Nese
I gave birth to two babies this year. The first was hikewildmontana.org, the only online, statewide trail guide to Montana. It gestated for more than four years and was born on a warm, sunny day in April. Governor Steve Bullock helped us celebrate the birth at a launch party on the deck of our office in Helena. With the capital city’s popular hiking trails in the background, the governor gave a speech extolling the virtues of Montana’s public lands and how much they mean for our outdoor economy.

My second baby, Celeste, was born in May when the bitterroots were in bloom.

I plan to spend a lifetime hiking with both.

When both of these babies were just a month or so old, I got a call from Skylar Browning, editor of the Missoula Independent. He wanted to let me know that hikewildmontana.org would be featured in the Independent’s special summer “Explorer” edition. It was just one of many stories about the new guide that appeared in newspapers, magazines, TV shows, and radio broadcasts across the country. Montana Magazine, The Seattle Times, San Francisco Chronicle, and Alaska Airlines’ inflight magazine were among the publications that covered the trail guide.

I was about to hang up when Skylar added, “I went to South Fork Lolo Creek last weekend with my kids. It was beautiful! I’ve lived in Missoula for 20 years but never knew about this place. It’s so close to town.”

Just a 30-minute drive from Missoula, this gem of wild Montana would be designated wilderness if not for President Reagan’s 1988 veto. Despite this setback, MWA has never given up on this special place. Volunteers lead Wilderness Walks here every year in hopes that each person who connects with South Fork Lolo Creek will be the next advocate for its protection. Hikewildmontana.org continues the tradition of Wilderness Walks, helping us reach young professionals like Skylar, as well as young families and the young at heart.

When I step foot on a new trail, I think of Skylar and his kids discovering their backyard wildlands. I also think about backpacking with Celeste in her first few months, wading knee-deep through the Centennials’ wildflowers, stepping over cascading pools in the Swan Range’s Grizzly Basin, and traversing jagged peaks in the Crazy Mountains. Once you’ve been to these places, it’s impossible not to love them. And once you’re in love with the wild, what can you do but fight for its future?

I imagine this scenario—people emotionally connecting to a wild place—playing out 40,000 times over, one time for each person who’s used hikewildmontana.org since we launched in April. Imagine if each of those 40,000 people brings friends or children, and each of them falls head-over-heels in love with our wildlands.

It’s a movement in the making.

Mother and son enjoying Our Lake in the Rocky Mountain Front
Throughout the year, I travel around northwest Montana, meeting people as diverse as the area’s creeks and mountains. Wild places in this corner of the state are at the heart of my work, but it’s the people I meet along the way that fuel my drive to protect little-known, but majestically wild places such as Roderick Mountain and the Scotchman Peaks.

During the fall of 2016, many of us in the Kootenai Forest Stakeholders Coalition (KFSC) organized open houses in small communities around northwest Montana, including Libby, Eureka, Noxon, and Troy. A diverse group of Montanans who live, work, and play in the Kootenai National Forest, the KFSC is dedicated to finding common-ground solutions for managing this forest.

In early November, the KFSC presented our community-based proposal to about 40 people at the Fire Hall in Noxon. We discussed the agreement we reached to secure a sustainable flow of timber, protect recreation opportunities, and set aside 180,000 acres of new Wilderness in the Cabinet Mountains, the Scotchman Peaks, and the grizzly-abundant Yaak. After the presentations, I visited with county commissioners, chatted with Forest Service employees, and met several residents of Sanders County who voiced genuine support for more Wilderness.

One gentleman who introduced himself as a long-time MWA member and supporter offered me his hand, looked me square in the eye, and gave one of the sincerest compliments I’ve heard. “Amy,” he said, “thank you for all you do, for all your hard work to protect wilderness, especially in the Scotchmans and Cabinets.” He smiled, and I was reminded why I love my job.

It’s humbling to be doing the kind of work that generates this gratitude, and it’s an honor to bring people with different interests together to protect the Montana wildlands we all love.

With the open houses behind us, the next steps for the KFSC are to fine-tune our agreement and work with our congressional delegation to introduce legislation. In the meantime, I’ll keep traveling around northwest Montana and building support for the KFSC, fueled by the Montanans I meet while working on behalf of wild places.

One of the aspects of my job I like most is taking people to places they’ve never been before. In the summer of 2016, I took several people to a place in central Montana called West Crooked Creek.

As we sat on a ridgetop eating lunch and gazing at a stunning vista of the area’s grasslands and ponderosa-studded coulees, I heard someone in our group say, “I simply had no idea that prairie lands like this existed—it’s so big and vast and beautiful.” Another said, “It seems unchanged, almost like stepping back in time and seeing what others have seen for thousands of years.”

Hearing comments like these tells me that the people who have been to West Crooked Creek will remember it and feel compelled to protect it.

Connecting people to wild places that deserve protection is a vital part of our work, and we do it because there are a lot of wild places in Montana that are not well known or easily accessible. That holds especially true for many of the wildlands in central Montana managed by the Bureau of Land Management Lewistown Field Office, places such as Dovetail Creek, Dunn Ridge, and Chain Buttes.

These are just three of 16 areas in the Lewistown Field Office, covering more than 170,000 acres, that the BLM and MWA volunteers have identified as having wilderness characteristics. But none of these places are protected.

Not yet, at least.

This year, the BLM began revising its Lewistown Resource Management Plan (RMP), and we’re making sure that the agency hears from people who want those places protected under the new plan. Key to that effort is raising the profile of these lesser-known places so that MWA members and the general public know more about them and work to protect them.

To that end, we joined with local sportsmen and Headwaters Economics to conduct an analysis of these areas covered in the RMP. That study showed that in just one popular big game hunting district, where most of these BLM wildlands are located, elk hunting alone accounted for nearly $2.2 million in economic expenditure in 2015. The amazingly healthy elk population drawing hunters would not exist without a wild, intact landscape.

We also invited reporters from local newspapers and television stations to join us on flights over areas we’re trying to protect. These flights resulted in six television and newspaper stories that reached across the state, bringing these special places to the attention of a huge swath of Montanans.

Stay tuned in 2017 as we continue fighting for wildlands in central Montana and hold the BLM’s feet to the fire as the agency decides how it will manage these places for the next 20 to 30 years.
